Huanglong's death

One day, Huanglong entered the hall and addressed the monks, saying, "This mountain monk has little talent and sparse virtue, yet I've borne the task of being a teacher. So, not being blind to original mind, not deceiving the ancestors, not avoiding birth and death, I now avoid birth and death. Due to not leaving the wheel, I now leave the wheel. That which is not cast off is thus now cast off. That not realized is now completely realized. Thus the light of Buddhism that has passed down from the World-Honored Great Enlightened One is that not a single Dharma can be obtained. What is it that was transmitted to the Sixth Ancestor in the dead of night at Huangmei?"

Huanglong then recited the following verse:

*Attaining not attaining,
Transmitting not transmitting,
How can one speak of Returning to the root and attaining the essence?
Recalling the leaks in her old dwelling,
To what house does the new bride travel?*

The next day at noon, Huanglong assumed a cross-legged sitting posture and passed away. His memorial stupa was placed on the hill before the temple. He received the posthumous title "Zen Master Universal Enlightenment."

words from our Abbot, Rev Myo Lahey:

SZ: My next question may seem inappropriate, asking you, as a gay man, to comment on issues faced by the GLBT community in their Zen practice. I say inappropriate because the question assumes you might have special insight on the matter but only for the fact that you are a gay man yourself.

MDL: I wouldn't say there are that many issues faced around here so much. I have encountered various degrees of homophobia and so forth in Dharma practice settings, but not really in the San Francisco Bay area. That is not something you see so much. So my own feeling is that there aren't that many particular issues beyond the fact that members of any minority who are entering in to spiritual practice feel a bit more at home if there is someone else like them around, you know? If they are the only person of color in a white sangha, or the only gay person in a straight sangha, it can feel a little weird. So, to know and understand that there were other lesbians and gay men in the sangha that I was practicing with where it is not quite so comfortable. For instance, a friend of mine one time wanted to live at another Dharma center here in San Francisco and the resident lama said, "Well, sorry you can't because one of our donors doesn't like gay people. You cannot live here." I was totally shocked by this—it was really bizarre. So, that just goes to show that one can encounter homophobia among Dharma practitioners, too.

website blues: the website was hacked recently (hszc.org) and so the site went down several days, and then finally thanks to the efforts of Shindō N. Strzelczyk it's back up!

Final bit is the dharma talks which are being worked on; when restored you can those via Issanji or Hartford Street Zen Center via itunes or; Here is where to see them on our website: <http://hszc.org/podcasts/> on august 11, barely after the Moon's First Quarter, it will set by 1:00 A.M. for the perfect environment in which to see the Perseid meteor shower! all indications are that 2016 will be a great year to see this spectacular show of shooting stars.

sangha member Rin McCarthy is walking across the USA again to continue to connect us with the environment and mother earth's cry for help -

"So how is it possible to feel profoundly pessimistic about mankind's chances for longterm survival and the health of the planet, and simultaneously feel an enthusiasm for this particular life and the opportunity to be a 'voice for Gaia'? Buddhism teaches us to embrace paradox, or at least to confront the paradox of universal truths in the context of our life in the chaotic relative world. I have just re-watched the film, 'What the Bleep do we know!?' to remind myself of the universal spiritual and scientific (according to quantum physics) truth of interconnectedness, among other things.

This film also illustrates very poetically that we create our personal reality moment by moment, through the power of our thoughts, choices and intentions. A small, seemingly insignificant act can have a long reach. And an open heart and mind can pave our way, as I learned over and over last year while walking east. " - Rin - March 2016 picking up where she left off in Spring 2015 (Colorado) Rin is walking again to reach the east coast.
